Research Summary

A soda photomask is a critical component used in the photolithography process of semiconductor fabrication. It consists of a thin, transparent substrate, typically made of quartz or soda-lime glass, coated with a patterned layer of chromium or other light-blocking material. The pattern on the photomask corresponds to the desired layout of features on the semiconductor wafer. During photolithography, ultraviolet (UV) light is projected through the photomask onto a light-sensitive photoresist layer on the wafer, transferring the pattern onto the semiconductor material. Soda photomasks are essential for defining the intricate patterns of transistors, circuits, and other components on integrated circuits (ICs) and microchips, enabling the precise fabrication of electronic devices used in various industries, including electronics, telecommunications, and computing.

The major global manufacturers of Soda Photomask include Toppan, Photronics, ShenZheng QingVi, Taiwan Mask, Newway Photomask, SK-Electronics, Compugraphics, Nippon Filcon, etc. The global players competition landscape in this
