Research Summary

Sponge rubber, also known as cellular rubber or foam rubber, is a type of rubber material characterized by a porous, sponge-like structure. It is made by incorporating gas bubbles into the rubber during the manufacturing process, resulting in a material that is lightweight, flexible, and resilient. Sponge rubber can be produced in various forms, including open-cell and closed-cell structures. Open-cell sponge rubber has interconnected pores, making it breathable and soft, while closed-cell sponge rubber has isolated pores, providing better water and air resistance. This material is widely used in applications such as gaskets, seals, cushioning, insulation, and padding due to its excellent compressibility, shock absorption, and ability to return to its original shape after deformation. Its versatility and durable properties make sponge rubber suitable for a broad range of industrial, automotive, and consumer product applications.

The major global manufacturers of Sponge Rubber include RubberMill, GCP Industrial Products, American National Rubber, Kirkhill Manufacturing Company (KMC), Martin's Rubber, Colonial DPP, SJG International, Griswold, Elasto Proxy, Stockwell
