Research Summary

A tabletop scanning electron microscope (SEM) is a compact and portable version of a traditional SEM that is designed to be placed on a laboratory benchtop or desktop. It offers high-resolution imaging capabilities similar to larger, floor-standing SEMs but in a smaller and more accessible package. Tabletop SEMs are typically used in research laboratories, educational institutions, and industrial settings for a wide range of applications, including materials science, nanotechnology, biology, and geology. These instruments utilize electron beams to generate high-resolution images of samples by scanning their surfaces. Tabletop SEMs are easier to operate and maintain compared to larger SEMs, making them suitable for users who require frequent access to imaging capabilities without the need for extensive training or specialized facilities. They offer versatility, convenience, and affordability while still providing powerful imaging capabilities for analyzing microstructures and surface topographies at the nanoscale level.

The major global manufacturers of Tabletop SEM include Thermo Fisher Scientific, Hitachi High-Tech Corporation, Jeol Ltd., DeLong, COXEM, SEC Co., Ltd, Emcrafts,
