Research Summary

Tobacco is a plant native to the Americas, belonging to the Nicotiana genus, and is widely known for its leaves, which contain nicotine—a psychoactive alkaloid. Tobacco has been traditionally used for smoking, chewing, or snuffing, and it is a major component in various forms of tobacco products. Hookah, on the other hand, is a water pipe used for smoking flavored and often sweetened tobacco. The tobacco used in hookahs is typically referred to as shisha or maassel, and it is heated by charcoal, with the smoke passing through water before inhalation. Hookah smoking is a social and cultural practice in many regions, offering a communal setting for individuals to enjoy flavored tobacco. While some perceive hookah smoking as less harmful than cigarette smoking due to water filtration, it still poses health risks, as inhaling the combusted substances can lead to exposure to harmful chemicals and toxins. Both tobacco and hookah use are subjects of health concerns and public health campaigns aiming to raise awareness about the associated risks.
