Research Summary

A Time-of-Flight (TOF) PET scanner is an advanced imaging device used in medical diagnostics to produce high-resolution images of metabolic processes in the body. By detecting pairs of gamma photons emitted indirectly by a positron-emitting radionuclide tracer, the scanner provides precise localization of tracer uptake, enhancing the clarity and accuracy of the resulting images. TOF PET scanners leverage the time difference between the arrival of these photons at detectors to calculate the exact position of the emission event within the body, thereby improving image quality, reducing scan times, and enabling more accurate detection of diseases such as cancer.
