Research Summary

White marble is a type of metamorphic rock characterized by its predominantly white coloration and distinctive veining patterns. It is formed from the recrystallization of limestone under high temperature and pressure conditions deep within the Earth's crust. The pure white color of marble is typically due to the presence of calcite or dolomite minerals, while the veining patterns are often caused by the presence of other minerals such as graphite, clay, or hematite that were present during the formation process. White marble has been prized for its beauty and elegance for centuries and has been used in various architectural and artistic applications, including sculptures, monuments, buildings, flooring, countertops, and decorative accents. It is valued for its luxurious appearance, durability, and ability to reflect light, making it a popular choice for adding a touch of sophistication and refinement to interior and exterior spaces.
