Abstracts

In 2024, baby food in Kenya is projected to see a moderate increase in retail volume growth, yet a double-digit rise in retail current value sales. This performance is informed by still high inflation and a strong rise in the average retail current unit price. While the birth rate is on a gradual downward trajectory, it is set to be largely stable in 2024. The category remains underdeveloped as traditional baby food is still preferred by low-income and rural consumers. Importantly, there is stil...
