Abstracts

In early 2022, Hong Kong experienced a fifth and most severe wave of the pandemic, where it was reported that almost half of the city's population was infected with COVID-19. This led to the reintroduction of various restrictions (including remote working and school closures), and local consumers spending greater time at home. As a result, eating occasions once again shifted back to the home, benefiting retail demand for all categories across cooking ingredients and meals. However, the need for...
