Abstracts

The Mexican economy suffered a contraction of just under 7% in GDP in 2009 as a result of the global recession, worsened by internal factors such as the dependence of the local economy on exports to the US, falling oil prices and the swine flu outbreak. Hence, unemployment rose, credit flows contracted, and food prices, services costs, and taxes increased, diminishing the disposable income for the majority of Mexicans. However, sales of units of packaged food maintained positive, yet marginal,...
