Abstracts

In an effort to constrain the steady rise in healthcare expenses due to the increasing burden on state finances, Japan's government decided to reduce drug prices covered by public health insurance by nearly 1.5% in April 2018. The measure, which also narrowed down the type of drugs eligible for the country's price maintenance premium by an estimated 35%, aimed at reflecting real market prices of pharmaceuticals as well. Exemptions included only first-in-class therapies and the two next-in-class...
