Abstracts

For extended periods over the last two years (2020 and 2021), consumers in Indonesia have been in home seclusion in order to curb the spread of the COVID-19 virus in the country. As consumers spent more time at home, home cooking became a more important element of consumers lives. Even though consumers spent more time at home, however, they still faced pressure from work and family commitments, and, in the absence of consumer foodservice options, many turned to ready meals products for quick and...
