Abstracts

The outbreak of COVID-19 saw students studying from home, with many employers working remotely or from the household. This saw an uplift in consumers using computers, boosting paperless work. As such, this naturally has a negative impact on sales of writing instruments. In 2022, although the majority of consumers are back in offices and students are back in school, the paperless trend continues. As such, while the majority of writing instruments have seen current retail value growth due to risin...
