Product overview

Cloud Computing is the use of hardware and software to deliver a service over a network to process, store, and manage data. It is a common storage space in which all data can be accessed simultaneously. An example is Google's Gmail. Cloud computing is used in games software and other software used by offices and institutions. During the COVID-19 pandemic, the cloud computing market is on the rise as it improves the ability of enterprises to examine important data to ensure improved responses. It also increases the efficiency of online marketing, web designing, editing, engineering, and back-office work. The lockdown in several countries has impacted the cloud market as employees are working remotely with companies using robust two-way tools in order to run operations smoothly which has assured the stability of web-based platforms and services.

Market Highlights

In 2019, the impact of COVID-19 on the cloud computing market grew at USD 233 billion and is predicted to grow at a CAGR of 19.4% during the forecast period. Major factors affecting the growth of this market include the offices and enterprises investing in IT infrastructure for cloud service providers, internet service providers, and managed to host providers. The rise in demand for cloud-based services and suitability of the public cloud environment is best suited for the current pandemic scenario. Organizations have improved the level of innovation and with the outbreak of COVID-19 a majority of operations have been compromised; as a result, many organizations have to function in a non-optimized manner.

Cloud Computing Market: Drivers

E-commerce and increased productivity to increase market growth

Cloud computing has become essential due to the covid-19 pandemic, from games to office software. E-commerce is gaining popularity amidst the coronavirus lockdown as food selling and other essential supplies delivery is moving online. The online retailers are using cloud hosting solutions that do not disrupt the business. This market is on a rise during the pandemic as it improves the ability of the enterprises to examine appropriate data and ensure an improved response. Cloud computing also provides improvements in productivity for works that are not ideal with telecommuting. Skype, ClickMeeting, Slack are also relying on this market which is a major driver in the growth of the sector.

High expectations of consumers decrease the market growth

The major restraints in the internet of things market are meeting the expectations of the customer in terms of process optimization, keeping the IoT hardware updated, easing security concerns due to various connected networks, connectivity issues, waiting for government regulations.

Cloud Computing Market: Regions

The region segment can be further divided into five major types including North America, Latin America, Europe, APAC, and MENA.

In the global market for cloud computing, the UK holds the first place followed by Germany and France. The increasing investments made by the service providers for increasing their presence in that region and fulfilling the requirements of customers is the reason for the growth of the market amidst covid-19. North America holds the largest market size in cloud computing among all the other regions. Factors boosting growth include the rising focus of enterprises on flexible options with better internet connectivity. The presence of key players such as Cisco Systems Inc., Google Microsoft Corporation, IBM Corporation, and others also add to the market strength in the region. In the APAC region through technology spending is increased, the setback of the covid-19 is immense and thus the cloud adoption is forecasted to increase work from home initiatives.
