Abstracts

Data center cooling refers to the process of managing and maintaining a suitable temperature and humidity level in a data center to ensure the optimal performance and longevity of the IT equipment housed within. Cooling is a critical aspect of data center operations, as overheating can cause equipment failure, downtime, and even data loss. The data center cooling market in Europe is projected to rise by USD 1.2 billion by 2029, according to the latest market study results. It is anticipated to expand at a CAGR of 8.6 percent during the forecast period. This growth is being driven by a number of factors, including the increasing adoption of cloud computing, the rise of big data, and the growing demand for data centers in emerging economies. Cloud computing has become a popular solution for businesses seeking to store and process large amounts of data. As more companies move their operations to the cloud, the demand for data center cooling solutions is expected to increase. Additionally, the rise of big data has created a need for more powerful and efficient computing systems, which in turn requires more advanced cooling solutions.
