Apex locator is an indispensable tool in modern dental clinics that can help dentists improve the accuracy and efficiency of their treatments effectively. An apex locator commonly consists of electrodes, displays, signal generators, and other components. When it comes to the pair of electrodes, one is typically clipped to a patient's lip while the other is attached to an endodontic file. It accurately determines the length of the tooth root canal by measuring the resistance or impedance changes of the periodontal membrane in contact surrounding the tooth root canal. A current begins to flow, which triggers the device to sound or register a digital readout.

Apex locator is a clinical tool used in dental treatment to determine the position of tooth root tips. It is crucial for the accuracy of root canal treatment and is used to assist in determining the working length of tooth root canal treatment. It determines the distance between the instrument and the root apex by measuring the electrical resistance of the oral mucosa and the instrument inserted into the root canal when it reaches the apical foramen. The development of root apex locator has gone through several generations of technological innovations such as resistance measurement and current measurement. At present, the development status and prospects of root apex locators seem to be positive. With the advancement of technology and the increase in market demand, such devices are developing towards higher accuracy, more convenient operation, and more intelligence to meet the needs of dental professionals and patients.
