Abstracts

Osteoporosis disease is the most prevalent disease that occurs due to bone mineral density which causes heavy risk of fractures and bone fragility. The disease occurs mostly in spine, hip, shoulder and forearm. Hip fractures are most common as nearly one-third of patients lose mobility and need long-term nursing. As patients are unable to move, prolonged complications arising out of bed immobilization ultimately results into fatality. The diagnostic measures of osteoporosis include X-ray and radiography tests that are further acknowledged with bone density test.

Osteoporosis is more prevalent in geriatric women than men; hence the suggested treatment is known as anti-osteoporosis which is intended to increase the bone mineral density and keeps a control over loss of bone tissue. Anti-osteoporosis reduces the risk of fractures by significant percent.
