Abstracts

The global Bentonite Liner market size is expected to reach $ million by 2029, rising at a market growth of % CAGR during the forecast period (2023-2029).

Bentonite liner is a type of geosynthetic clay liner (GCL) that is commonly used in the construction of landfills, ponds, and other containment systems. It is made up of two layers of geotextile fabric that sandwich a layer of bentonite clay.

Bentonite is a highly absorbent clay that swells when it comes into contact with water. This property makes it an excellent material for use in containment systems because it can create an impermeable barrier that prevents water and other liquids from seeping through.

To create a bentonite liner, the bentonite clay is first mixed with water to form a slurry. This slurry is then spread onto one of the geotextile layers, which is then folded over to cover the clay layer. The second geotextile layer is then placed on top of the first layer, creating a sandwich with the bentonite clay in the middle. The layers are then stitched together to create a strong, durable liner.

Bentonite liners are often used in combination with other liner materials, such as high-density polyethylene (HDPE), to create a multi-layered system that provides even greater protection against leaks and contamination.

This report studies the global Bentonite Liner production, demand, key manufacturers, and key regions.
