Clean label has an ingredient statement that is easy to comprehend to the average consumer, using familiar ingredients. Evidence suggests that consumers perceive some additives and ingredients as more harmful if their names are difficult to pronounce or unfamiliar. Dickson-Spillman further showed that consumers' attitudes toward synthetic chemicals influence their risk perception of ingredients in food, and that their risk perception of chemicals in food positively correlates with a preference for natural foods. Recent research suggests that consumers interested in clean label food are looking for familiar ingredients, shorter ingredient lists, and ingredients that are minimally processed.

The "clean label" designation is most commonly ascribed to a food based on the presence or absence of certain ingredients used in the food. And the certain ingredients are mainly including three categories: organic, natural and "free from" artificial additives/ingredients.
