The main driving factors for the development of commercial snow removal and ice removal services include the following aspects:

Climate change: Climate change has led to an increase in extreme weather events, including snowstorms, freezing weather and other weather conditions, which has increased the need for snow removal and ice removal.

Urbanization process: In the process of urbanization, insufficient urban planning and infrastructure construction have made the impact of snow and ice on public facilities such as roads and bridges more serious, thereby promoting the growth of demand for snow removal and deicing services.

Development of the logistics industry: The development of the logistics industry has increasingly higher requirements for road accessibility and safety. In particular, the rapid development of e-commerce, express delivery and other industries has increased the demand for snow removal and ice removal services.

Increased Public Safety Awareness: The public's awareness of public safety continues to increase, and so does the demand for snow removal and ice removal services to ensure public safety and reduce traffic accidents.

Technological progress: The application of new technologies in the field of snow and ice removal, such as the development of intelligent snow removal equipment and efficient deicing agents, has improved the efficiency of snow and ice removal, reduced costs, and further promoted the development of commercial snow and ice removal services.

Government policy support: The government has increased its support for public services and infrastructure construction, including subsidies, preferential policies and mandatory regulations for snow removal and ice removal services, which is conducive to the development of commercial snow removal and ice removal services.

Market demand growth: As people's demand for safety and convenience during winter travel increases, as well as the requirements for property management and public environment maintenance, the market demand for commercial snow removal and deicing services continues to grow.
