Crop Liability Insurance is an insurance product that provides protection for crops in agricultural production. It aims to help farmers obtain financial compensation when facing crop losses caused by natural disasters, severe weather, pests, and diseases. This insurance product not only covers physical losses of crops but also typically covers income losses due to the inability to cultivate normally or production interruptions. Policyholders of crop liability insurance typically include farmers, agricultural cooperatives, and agro-enterprises. Insurance products are customized based on crop type, geographical location, and risk characteristics to ensure that farmers can mitigate their financial burden when facing agricultural production risks. The global gross profit margin for Crop Liability Insurance was approximately 30% in 2025.

Crop liability insurance is a crucial component of agricultural insurance. With the increasing frequency of extreme weather events due to global climate change, farmers' demand for this type of insurance is rising. Agricultural production is inherently risky, especially in developing regions. Crops face significant risks due to natural disasters, weather changes, and pests and diseases. Crop liability insurance provides farmers with a tool for risk management and economic protection. In the market, with advancements in agricultural technology and innovation in insurance products, crop liability insurance is gradually becoming more personalized and intelligent. Policyholders can choose the most suitable protection plan based on the specific crop and their region. Particularly against the backdrop of intensifying climate change, insurance products are not only focusing on crop production losses but also covering price fluctuations and income losses caused by climate change. Furthermore, with the application of digital insurance and agricultural technology, more and more farmers can conveniently purchase and claim insurance through mobile applications, further promoting market penetration. However, in many developing regions, the penetration rate of crop liability insurance remains low, facing three main challenges: insufficient farmer awareness of insurance products, high product prices, and lengthy claims mechanisms and processing times. Government policy support and market education will be key factors for future market expansion.
