Abstracts

Sauce fragrant liquor refers to a type of Daqu liquor represented by Moutai, a distilled liquor with sorghum as the main raw material. The aroma of soy sauce spirits is mainly emitted by hexanoic acid, ethyl hexanoate, aromatic compounds, diols and other substances, which have the characteristics of 'four highs, one low and one many', i.e. high acid, high alcohol, high aldehydes and ketones, high amino acids, low esters and many nitrogenous compounds (many types and quantities). The production process of soy sauce spirits is characterized by four high temperatures: high-temperature quill making, high-temperature stacking, high-temperature fermentation and high-temperature reception; all of which are the highest among all spirits, with quill making and fermentation reaching 60 degrees Celsius, stacking reaching 45 to 50 degrees Celsius and distillation reception reaching 40 degrees Celsius. High-temperature distillation can exclude volatile sulfides and other irritating low-boiling substances, so there are fewer volatile substances left in the wine, and more high-boiling aromatic substances that are not easily volatile can be retained. Because of the high cost of the materials used, the strict restrictions of the natural environment, the complexity of the brewing process, the long production cycle and the low output, the output of soy sauce type liquor accounts for only 2-3% of the total production of liquor in mainland China, but the sales account for 15-20%, and the profit accounts for 35% of the whole industry.
