Meglinitides are the agents used to treat type 2 diabetes. They act same as β -cell receptor as sulphonylureas, but have a different chemical structure. They are novel class of non-sulfonylurea insulin secretagogues characterized by very rapid onset and abbreviated duration of action. They act by stimulating pancreas to release insulin in response to meal. In functioning pancreatic beta cells, it also closes ATP-dependent potassium dependent channels. Due to this depolarization of beta cells, opening of calcium channels resulting in influx of calcium and Increased intracellular calcium induces insulin secretion.
