Sustainable fashion design refers to the process of creating clothing, accessories, and other fashion items in an environmentally and socially responsible manner. This includes using sustainable materials, reducing waste and pollution, and ensuring fair labor practices throughout the supply chain. The distribution of the sustainable fashion market share by region varies, with North America and Europe being the largest markets due to the high level of awareness and demand for sustainable products in these regions. Asia Pacific is also a growing market, with countries like Japan and China showing increasing interest in sustainable fashion.

The upstream industry chain of sustainable fashion design includes the production of sustainable materials such as organic cotton, recycled polyester, and biodegradable fabrics. These materials are then used by fashion designers and manufacturers to create sustainable fashion products. The downstream industry chain includes the distribution, marketing, and sale of these products to consumers.
