Real-time bidding (RTB) refers to the process of buying and selling online advertisements, impressions or views through live, automated auctions. It is a crucial component of programmatic buying, where once the buyer wins an auction, his/her advertisement is instantly displayed on the publisher's website. Instead of inventory-centric and bulk buying, real-time bidding mimics the functioning of the stock exchange and uses computer-based algorithms to make the trade in milliseconds. It enhances the effectiveness of advertising campaigns by analyzing demographics and behavioral data obtained from the internet, thus aiding in improved attribution accuracy, and greater transparency and profit margins, while reducing media wastage and overall costs.

Real-Time Bidding Market Trends:

The key factors driving the growth of the market include the proliferation of various social media platforms and the rapidly increasing number of internet users across the globe. The thriving e-commerce and retail industries are also providing a boost to the market. Consumers are increasingly spending time surfing the internet and watching online content through smartphones, computers and laptops. This has encouraged the advertisers to invest in RTB video ads, as they are proving to be a powerful tool to engage the target audience. Additionally, increasing service adoption by businesses to display personalized ads to individual users according to their online activity is also creating a positive impact on the market. Advertisers can buy and sell individual page views in real-time to enhance their campaign efficiency and brand awareness. Moreover, the integration of digital marketing, machine learning (ML) and artificial intelligence (AI) techniques with the bidding software is projected to drive the market further. Other factors, such as significant growth and advancements in the media and entertainment industry, along with the rising trend of digital marketing, are also creating a positive outlook for the market.
