Abstracts

The Global Data Collection and Labeling Market size is expected to reach $3.5 billion by 2026, rising at a market growth of 28.4% CAGR during the forecast period. Social media monitoring is one of the most common applications for data collection, as the key factors in digital marketing are visual listening and visual analytics. The technology is also used extensively in security-related applications, such as data collection for facial recognition used by law enforcement agencies.

Many businesses are taking strategic steps by outsourcing data collection and labeling services to create strong machine-learning models. For example, Globalme Localization Inc., a U.S. - based data collection firm, provided Sonos Inc., a U.S. - based audio company with the dialect and accent audio processing. Through collecting accents and speech data across three continents, Sonos Inc. combined the digital home assistants with their wireless speakers. The integration helped to fine-tune the company's speech recognition systems to provide a better voice experience.

Data labeling is the manual solution for machine learning and AI applications data by humans. Labeling data is important because computers have endless shortcomings and some of them can't be overcome easily without human intervention. A machine can potentially be trained to do complex calculations and manage tasks that would be too burdensome for humans to handle manually, but the same cannot tell the difference between a dog's and a car's picture in a photo without proper training. In short, machines use a dataset-based algorithm to understand what normally involves someone to supervise. It is called supervised machine learning loosely because computers require human guidance to be qualified to perform tasks that are difficult for robots, but obviously easy for people like image recognition. Hence, there is the need for a data labeler.
