Abstracts

Learning Management System (LMS), alternatively, derived from the PLATO method in the 1970s and over time evolved into a collection of alternatives for online coaching. Szabo & Flesher (2002) stated that an LMS could be the facilities which provides and deals with educational content, determines and evaluates individual and organizational learning or coaching objectives, monitors the improvement in the direction of achieving those objectives, and records and provides data for monitoring the educational process of an organization in its entirety. An LMS presents several advantages for e-learning. Being an integrated application which stores training course resources, interactions and evaluation in a structured fashion, an LMS makes it possible for students to concentrate on their particular comprehension process. Course instructors share content material very easily whilst dealing with and monitoring learner development and directing them for additional involvement with the training course materials. It is additionally considered that e-learning settings might have prospective additional learning advantages and will enhance students' and educators' self-regulation competencies, especially their metacognitive skills. Inspite of these positive aspects, in the growth of LMS technology, it continues to be significantly less apparent, however, precisely what the in depth advantages of an LMS could possibly be, how these positive aspects could be assessed, along with what a totally effective execution of an LMS would appear like.
