According to this study, the global Animal Experimental Services market size will reach US$ 7371 million by 2031.

Animal experimental service refers to comprehensive scientific research outsourcing services provided to industries such as biomedicine, chemicals, food, and medical devices, with experimental animals as research objects, covering pharmacodynamic research, safety evaluation, toxicology testing, pharmacokinetic analysis, and disease model construction in the early stages of drug development. This type of service is usually carried out on an animal experiment platform that meets the standards of GLP (Good Laboratory Practice) and AAALAC (International Accreditation for the Care and Use of Laboratory Animals), and is widely used in the fields of preclinical research of new drugs, functional food development, disease mechanism exploration, and medical technology verification. The experimental service objects mainly include mammals such as mice, rats, rabbits, dogs, pigs, and monkeys, and the research methods cover technologies such as in vivo imaging, histopathology, blood biochemical analysis, and gene expression detection. With the development of life science and technology and the strengthening trend of global R&D outsourcing, animal experimental services are becoming more professional and large-scale, and are evolving towards model standardization, data traceability, and ethical compliance. It has become an indispensable and important part of the CRO (Contract Research Organization) industry chain.

United States market for Animal Experimental Services is estimated to increase from US$ million in 2024 to US$ million by 2031, at a CAGR of % from 2025 through 2031.
