Bomb shelter and fallout shelter are two different types of shelters. Bomb shelters are designed to protect us from traditional explosions for a short period of time. A fallout shelter is designed to keep us protected from radioactive fallout. This means that it provides filtered air, has clean drinking water and food for long enough to allow the radiation to drop to an acceptable level. A fallout shelter is comprised of steel, and buried underground to create a livable environment in case of a nuclear blast. The deeper beneath the soil that the shelter is built, the safer inhabitants are from fallout. The half life involved in nuclear radiation is incredibly long, and no area within many miles will be completely free from radiation. However, within the fallout shelter the radiation will be greatly decreased. A bomb shelter is made out of anything that is dense enough to protect the inhabitants from the blast and frag that occurs when detonations occur. Sand and concrete are probably the most common materials used to build bomb shelters because they're cheap and easy to build with.
