A bucket belt elevator, also known as a bucket elevator or bucket conveyor, is a mechanical device used to vertically transport bulk materials such as grains, seeds, fertilizers, and other granular or powdered materials. It consists of a series of buckets attached to a belt or chain that moves in a continuous loop, allowing the buckets to scoop up the material at the bottom and carry it to the top where it is discharged.

The buckets are typically made of plastic, metal, or rubber and are spaced evenly along the belt or chain. They are designed to scoop up the material from a hopper or chute and carry it vertically or at an inclined angle. The belt or chain is driven by a motor and pulley system, which moves the buckets in a continuous loop.

Bucket belt elevators are commonly used in industries such as agriculture, mining, construction, and manufacturing, where there is a need to transport bulk materials vertically or at an inclined angle. They offer advantages such as high capacity, efficient and reliable operation, minimal maintenance requirements, and the ability to handle a wide range of materials.
