A Custody Transfer System is a critical process and set of equipment used to accurately measure, account for, and transfer ownership of goods—typically like oil, gas—between parties in a commercial transaction. The chief goal of a custody transfer system is to ensure measurements are as accurate as possible, as even the smallest discrepancies can translate to significant losses for the short-changed party, especially for high-value resources such as oil and gas. These systems generate detailed documentation for regulatory compliance, incorporate automation for real-time monitoring, and include provisions for assessing product quality, thereby ensuring safe and transparent transfer processes in various industries.
