Deodorant Socks are products that inhibit bacterial growth and eliminate foot odor by adding antibacterial agents or using special physical structures and functional materials. Their technical principles mainly utilize metal ions to disrupt bacterial cell membranes, or bamboo charcoal micropores to absorb acidic substances in sweat, and photocatalytic decomposition of odor molecules to achieve an odor-reducing effect. These products must meet national antibacterial testing standards and satisfy requirements for antibacterial rate and odor-reducing performance, ultimately reducing odor caused by volatile fatty acids produced from the interaction of foot sweat and bacteria.

The Deodorant Socks industry chain covers the entire process from raw material supply to end-user sales: upstream includes the research and development of knitting raw materials and antibacterial materials; midstream involves manufacturing, involving the integration of spinning, weaving, and antibacterial processes; downstream reaches consumers through online and offline channels, ultimately serving individuals, fitness groups, and other demanders. The industry chain achieves integrated collaboration from functional materials to finished product manufacturing, brand operation, and market expansion through collaborative innovation and digital marketing.

The Deodorant Socks consumer market is primarily male, covering business, sports, and children. The industry is currently promoting the research and development and intelligent production of bio-based antibacterial agents, and expanding through e-commerce channels to meet health needs while continuously optimizing the wearing experience.
