Eucalyptus Oil is a natural aromatic essential oil extracted from the leaves and young branches of eucalyptus (Eucalyptus tree). Its main component is cineole (1,8-cineole, accounting for 70%-90%), and contains citronellal, phellandrene and other ingredients. Its physical characteristics are colorless to slightly yellow transparent liquid with a cool camphor smell, density 0.895-0.920, and refractive index 1.458-1.470. The extraction process is mainly steam distillation, and the raw materials mainly come from fast-growing tree species such as eucalyptus globulus and eucalyptus striata.

Market drivers

Demand growth in the pharmaceutical sector

Due to its antibacterial, anti-inflammatory and expectorant properties, eucalyptus oil is widely used in cough suppressants, mouthwashes, ointments and disinfectants, especially in the treatment of respiratory diseases (such as colds and asthma), where demand is stable.

Modern medical research has confirmed its antiviral and antifungal effects, promoting its in-depth application in medicines and health products.

Naturalization trend in the daily chemical industry

Consumers' preference for natural ingredients has driven the addition of eucalyptus oil to toothpaste, shampoo and shower gel, and its antibacterial and refreshing properties are favored by the market.

As a bactericide in cleaning products (such as air fresheners and laundry detergents), it meets environmental protection needs.

Rising demand in the food industry

As a natural flavor and preservative, eucalyptus oil is used in baking, candy and beverages to extend shelf life and enhance flavor.

The expansion of the global natural food additives market has further driven demand.

Policy and sustainable development drive

The government encourages eucalyptus planting (such as agricultural subsidies) because its fast-growing characteristics help to fix carbon and reduce emissions, which is in line with environmental protection trends.

Stricter environmental regulations have prompted companies to adopt green production technologies and reduce pesticide residues.

International trade and policy impacts

Anti-dumping duties, tariff policies and free trade agreements affect international market supply and demand, and companies need to optimize processes to adapt to different market standards.

Major exporting countries (such as China and Australia) have expanded their market share through trade agreements.

Technological progress and cost optimization

Distillation and extraction technologies improve product quality, reduce production costs and enhance market competitiveness.

New technologies such as subcritical extraction increase oil yields and promote industrial upgrading.
