Fermented Hot Sauce is a chili-based condiment produced through controlled fermentation of fresh or processed chili peppers, typically using lactic acid bacteria and naturally occurring microorganisms to develop its characteristic acidity, aroma, and complex flavor profile. The formulation may contain salt, vinegar, garlic, fruits, spices, sweeteners, or other food ingredients depending on the recipe. Fermentation can also contribute to preservation and flavor maturation while distinguishing the product from non-fermented chili sauces. Fermented hot sauce is mainly used as a table condiment, cooking ingredient, marinade, dipping sauce, and foodservice ingredient. The product scope covers commercially packaged fermented chili sauces and excludes ordinary non-fermented hot sauces.

The industry chain begins upstream with fresh or dried chili peppers, salt, garlic, fruits, spices, vinegar, sugar, fermentation cultures, water, and packaging materials such as glass or plastic bottles and closures. Midstream manufacturers conduct raw-material
