Financial leasing financing services refer to a comprehensive financial service model that achieves financing functions through leasing. Financial leasing companies or bank-affiliated leasing institutions purchase fixed assets such as equipment, vehicles, machinery, and factory buildings on behalf of lessees (enterprises or individuals) based on their funding needs, and provide these assets to the lessees through long-term leases. The lessees pay rent within the agreed period, achieving the dual purpose of installment payments and financing. This service integrates financing, asset leasing, and trade, meeting the capital needs of enterprises to expand production and upgrade equipment while reducing the pressure of one-time capital investment. Furthermore, upon lease expiration, lessees can typically choose to purchase, renew, or return the leased assets, making it an important financial tool for promoting industrial upgrading and optimizing corporate capital structure.

The downstream industries of financial leasing financing services mainly include capital-intensive industries such as manufacturing, transportation, construction engineering, medical equipment, energy and power, information and communication, aviation and shipping, and public infrastructure. These industries generally have a strong financing demand for the purchase of large equipment, vehicles, or production lines. Manufacturing and construction companies can accelerate equipment upgrades and capacity expansion through financial leasing; medical institutions can acquire high-end imaging diagnostic equipment through leasing; and transportation and energy companies rely on leasing models for asset allocation such as vehicles, power equipment, and wind turbines. The industry's revenue model primarily relies on rental income and residual value disposal gains, with an overall gross profit margin typically around 32%.
