Casing and finishing nails are similar, differing primarily in the shapes of their heads. A finishing nail has a small, slightly rounded head that is just slightly bigger than the nail shank. The head is designed to accept the pointed tip of a nail set, making it easier to countersunk the nail without slipping and gouging the wood.

A casing nail essentially is large finishing nail. It is often used in exterior applications, such as for installing exterior trim boards and for nailing door frames and trim. They are commonly galvanized for corrosion-resistance. The nail head of a casing nail is tapered and may be set flush or just below the wood surface.
