Fluorite is an alkaline thinner, so named because it glows like a firefly when exposed to ultraviolet or cathode rays, but when fluorite contains some rare earth elements, it gives off phosphorescence. That is to say, fluorite can continue to glow for a long time after being exposed to ultraviolet or cathode rays. Such phosphorescent fluorite accounts for a small proportion of the production. In fact, most of them are made of fluorite. As the crystals of fluorite are generally larger, fluorite luminous pearl can be found in very large volume. Fluorite is relatively hard and brittle, so it is generally necessary to avoid violent collisions and contact with acidic substances.
