A graphite absorber refers to a material or structure made of graphite that is designed to absorb or capture specific substances or radiation. Graphite, a form of carbon known for its high thermal conductivity and chemical stability, is utilized in various applications where absorption properties are required.

Graphite absorbers can also be utilized in gas or liquid purification processes. The porous nature of graphite allows it to adsorb or absorb certain gases or liquids, removing impurities or contaminants from a system. This makes graphite absorbers valuable in applications such as water treatment, gas separation, and purification processes in the chemical industry.
