The global In-Flight Meals Service market size is predicted to grow from US$ 17681 million in 2025 to US$ 25169 million in 2032; it is expected to grow at a CAGR of 4.9% from 2026 to 2032.

In-flight meal service refers to a comprehensive system of catering services provided to passengers and crew during air transport, encompassing multiple stages including meal design, ingredient sourcing, centralized preparation, standardized packaging, cold chain transportation, and in-flight distribution. This service is typically provided by professional airline catering companies or the airline's own kitchens, strictly adhering to aviation safety and food hygiene standards. Depending on flight type, cabin class, and passenger needs, it offers various options ranging from simple meals to multi-course customized meals, aiming to enhance the passenger's flight experience and overall service quality.

In-flight meals service is a crucial component of the air transport service system, encompassing in-flight meal supply, food processing and distribution, in-flight catering services, and related logistics management. Its product formats include hot meals, cold meals, light snacks, beverages, and special meals (such as children's meals, halal meals, and low-sodium meals), aiming to enhance the passenger flight experience and airline brand image. With the gradual recovery of the global aviation industry and passengers' increasing demands for service quality, the in-flight catering service market is ushering in a new round of development opportunities.

In recent years, global air passenger traffic has recovered rapidly after the pandemic, with a significant rebound in demand for international routes and medium- and long-haul flights, driving a corresponding increase in demand for in-flight catering services. At the same time, airlines are continuously increasing their investment in service differentiation, and catering services are gradually upgrading from basic support to brand experience. The increasing demands for food quality and diversity on premium routes and in first and business class are driving the development of in-flight catering services towards refinement and premiumization.

From a product structure perspective, economy class remains the primary source of demand for in-flight catering services, but overall service standards remain relatively stable. Business and first class have become the core areas for high-value-added services, with meal design focusing more on quality, taste, and personalized experiences. In recent years, healthy eating, functional meals, and local specialty cuisine have gradually become industry trends, with some airlines enhancing the differentiation of their catering services through collaborations with well-known catering brands.

In terms of the industry chain, upstream includes food raw material suppliers and packaging material companies; midstream consists of airline catering service providers and central kitchen systems; and downstream comprises airlines and end passengers. The industry exhibits highly specialized and standardized characteristics, demanding extremely high standards for food safety, supply chain management, and on-time delivery capabilities. Large airline catering companies occupy a significant position in the market due to their large-scale production capabilities and global service networks.

From a regional market perspective, the North American and European aviation markets are mature, with well-established in-flight catering service systems and stable demand structures. The Asia-Pacific region, with its rapid growth in air travel demand, has become one of the most dynamic markets globally. Driven by the development of international aviation hubs, the Middle East is experiencing a continuous increase in demand for high-end in-flight catering services. Overall, the global market is showing a trend of simultaneous recovery and structural upgrading.

Looking ahead, the global in-flight dining service market will be driven by three core factors: first, the continued recovery and growth of air passenger traffic; second, intensified competition among airlines to differentiate their services; and third, increased consumer demand for healthy and personalized dining. Market growth is reflected not only in the increase in the number of flights, but also in the improvement of service quality and the increase in value per passenger.
