Industrial wireless hanging scales are devices used in the industrial sector for weighing objects during lifting operations. They primarily consist of a load cell, a data processing unit, a wireless communication module, a power supply module, and a display instrument. The load cell converts the gravitational force signal of the object into an electrical signal, which the data processing unit then processes and calculates to determine the weight value. This weight data is subsequently transmitted via the wireless communication module to the display instrument for visualization. A notable feature of these scales is that they are free from the constraints of traditional wired connections, making them convenient for use in complex industrial environments.
