Loquat cough syrup uses loquat leaves as its core ingredient, often combined with other medicinal herbs such as platycodon, stemona, and mulberry bark. It has the effects of nourishing yin and astringing the lungs, clearing the lungs and resolving phlegm, and relieving cough. Its core function is to alleviate cough symptoms and help expel phlegm by clearing and lowering lung qi, primarily addressing cough, difficulty expectorating phlegm, and excessive phlegm caused by bronchitis. The upstream supply chain mainly includes the planting and processing of Chinese medicinal herbs (such as the planting, harvesting, and initial processing of raw materials like loquat leaves, platycodon, stemona, and poppy shells) and the supply of excipients and packaging materials (such as sucrose, menthol, preservatives, and pharmaceutical glass/plastic bottles). The downstream supply chain delivers the finished product to retail terminals (such as pharmacies, hospital pharmacies, and e-commerce platforms) through pharmaceutical distribution channels (such as pharmaceutical companies and wholesalers), ultimately reaching consumers. In 2025, the production of loquat cough syrup is expected to reach approximately 20,000 tons, with an average price of approximately US$25,000 per ton, a gross profit margin of approximately 45%, and a single production line capacity of 500 tons per year.
