Linear tape file system (LTFS) copy software is a function that is issued to proficiently transfer files to and from LTFS tapes. The software is used for data export and import and data interchange and exchange. The LTFS copy software transfers files using multithreaded operations for improving the copy performance of files. The software copies files from the file system application programming interface. If the source or target file system is using the LTFS copy software, then users must mount the LTFS tape medium before replicating files. LTFS copy software is used for copying only regular files. Other files such as empty directories cannot be copied to the destination by using LTFS copy software. The software generates a copy of a substance of the symbolic link if a symbolic link to a file exists. LTFS copy software generates equivalent directories at the end point with full read, write, and execute permissions only when end-point directories for the regular files do not exist. The tape area is accessible through the virtual expanded attribute of LTFS, which shows the begin square location of that document. LTFS does not provide extended information about files. Therefore, if a file is divided, the duplicate would cause tape seeks. LTFS copy software offers benefits such as improved performance for defragmentation and retrieval of a tape medium and the ability to copy tape contents with optimum order.
