Cruise originally refers to a large passenger ship (shipping-liner) which is fixed and regularly sailed on the sea. In the early stage, it was also responsible for carrying mail between the two places. Because the word 'post' is related to the postal industry, it is called a cruise. With the development of aviation technology and tourism, cruise ships, originally used as passenger or postal transportation, have gradually withdrawn from the historical stage. Instead, luxury cruises with completely different locations are equipped with a variety of facilities for life, entertainment, leisure and vacation. Essentially, cruise is a 'floating hotel', a 'super five-star hotel' floating on the sea, known as 'aimless destination' and 'floating Resort at sea'. Therefore, cruise is not only a tool to transport passengers to visit mountains and rivers and enjoy the beautiful scenery, but also a comprehensive service platform for leisure and vacation.

Cruise companies provide a variety of services to passengers for different periods and routes. Consumers can choose from short-term (such as two days) to long-term (such as a few weeks) cruises. Each cruise serves a certain voyage, and the voyage itself and the recreational facilities on the cruise are the main components of consumer spending. Cruise speed, port of departure, tourist destination of berth, duration of voyage and distance between berths constitute the whole itinerary.
