Pectin is a natural product which can be found in the cell walls of all higher plants and it has long been used for its gel formation, thickening and stabilizing properties in a wide range of applications from food to the pharmaceutical and cosmetic industries. Highly-specialised pectins are derived primarily from apples and citrus fruits which have been juiced straight after picking and then carefully dried. At first pectin was sold as a liquid extract, but then as a dried powder which is easier to store and handle than a liquid.
