Premarital checkups refer to health examinations conducted by couples at professional medical institutions before marriage to ensure that both parties meet the basic requirements for a life together after marriage in terms of physical and genetic health. This service typically includes examinations of both parties' basic physical health, hereditary diseases, infectious diseases, and immune status, and may also cover assessments of reproductive health, sexual health, and mental health. The purpose of premarital checkups is to help both parties understand each other's health status, identify potential health risks, provide protection for married life, and reduce marital and reproductive risks caused by health problems.

With increasing health awareness and changing marriage concepts, the demand for premarital checkup services is gradually growing. In modern society, more and more young people are concerned about the long-term health factors of marriage, especially those involving fertility, hereditary diseases, and mental health. Therefore, premarital checkups are no longer just traditional physical examinations, but a more comprehensive health assessment process covering multiple aspects of physical, psychological, and genetic factors. With the implementation of the two-child policy and the increasing emphasis on healthy marriages in society, premarital checkups are gradually becoming part of the marriage culture in some countries and regions. Especially in populous countries like China and India, the premarital medical examination service will become increasingly popular among young people, driving the rapid development of the industry. Furthermore, with advancements in medical technology and the application of genetic testing, premarital medical examinations will become more comprehensive and professional, further expanding this market in the future.
