Hot-rolled stainless steel coils are made from stainless steel continuous casting slabs or initial rolled slabs, which are heated to a high temperature of 1100~1250 degrees Celsius in a step-type heating furnace, and then rolled through a rough rolling mill and a finishing mill. The rolled steel strip is cooled to the set temperature through laminar flow, and rolled into a steel strip coil by a coiler to finally obtain hot-rolled stainless steel coils. Hot-rolled stainless steel coils have high strength and toughness, which enables them to withstand greater stress and deformation in various application scenarios. In addition, hot-rolled stainless steel coils have good plasticity, are easy to process and form, and are suitable for various complex forming processes.
