The global Third-party Risk Management Service market size is predicted to grow from US$ 8315 million in 2025 to US$ 22366 million in 2032; it is expected to grow at a CAGR of 15.6% from 2026 to 2032.

Third-party risk management service refers to a set of professional advisory, implementation, and managed services that help organizations design, build, operate, and continuously improve their third-party risk management frameworks. These services typically cover the design of governance structures and policies, documentation of processes and procedures, due diligence on vendors and outsourcing partners, questionnaire and evidence collection, on-site and remote assessments, cybersecurity and data protection reviews, compliance and sanctions screening, financial and operational health checks, ESG and sustainability assessments, as well as ongoing monitoring, reporting, and remediation support. Global consulting firms, audit and advisory networks, and specialized risk service providers have developed end-to-end managed TPRM offerings and ?TPRM as a Service? models that combine expert teams with proprietary or third-party technology platforms, delivered from centers in North America, Europe, and Asia, and serving clients across banking and financial services, healthcare, manufacturing, technology, energy, and the public sector.

Worldwide, demand for third-party risk management services is being propelled by both structural and regulatory forces. Organizations are deepening their reliance on cloud providers, outsourced operations, SaaS platforms, and globally distributed supply chains, while a wave of supplier-related cyber incidents, data breaches, and enforcement actions has elevated third-party risk to the board and regulator agenda. At the same time, tightening rules on data privacy, anti-money laundering and sanctions, critical infrastructure protection, and supply-chain due diligence in the US and Europe are pushing firms to seek external support to build auditable governance frameworks and quantitative risk indicators. Market studies indicate that the overall third-party risk management market, covering both technology and services, has already reached a multi-billion-dollar size and is expected to maintain double-digit compound growth over the next several years, with managed and outsourced service models capturing an increasing share of spending.

However, the market still faces significant challenges and structural risks. Many organizations are in transition from ad hoc projects to enterprise-wide programs, and suffer from incomplete third-party inventories, inconsistent data standards, and fragmented ownership across business units, which forces service providers to dedicate substantial effort to basic data discovery and remediation. Despite the availability of modern platforms, a large share of companies still rely on spreadsheets and email to manage vendors, resulting in inefficiencies and blind spots, with only a minority tracking third parties consistently across the full relationship lifecycle and some vendors remaining entirely outside formal assessment processes. Providers must constantly balance the depth of customization, level of automation, and cost of delivery, while also navigating differing regional regulatory expectations, limited local data sources, and persistent shortages of experienced TPRM professionals.

From a demand perspective, enterprises are shifting away from one-off or annual reviews toward continuous monitoring service models that ingest external threat intelligence, cyber exposure data, financial health ratings, and media signals into dynamic third-party risk scores, and then outsource day-to-day monitoring and analysis to specialized managed-service teams. An increasing number of large organizations are adopting managed third-party risk management services that integrate tightly with existing procurement, compliance, and security processes, with providers offering round-the-clock surveillance, centralized analytics, and incident-response support to strengthen resilience against cyber attacks, supply-chain disruptions, and regulatory scrutiny. At the same time, highly regulated sectors such as financial services and healthcare are embracing common assurance frameworks and certification regimes, with service firms executing standardized assessments and certifications on their behalf, accelerating the evolution of TPRM services toward data-driven, industry-vertical, and regionally localized models, in which China and the broader Asia Pacific region are expected to be among the fastest-growing markets over the coming decade.
