Despite global economic uncertainty and a downturn in the worldwide composite materials industry, China's composites market grew by more than 2% through the worst of the recession in 2009. The Chinese market's growth momentum is expected to surge, reaching approximately US $11.5 billion in 2017 with a CAGR of 7.3% over the next five years. For 2012, the Chinese composites market is expected to surpass US $7 billion.

Lucintel, a leading global management consulting and market research firm, has analyzed the Chinese composites industry and presents its findings in its report, "Growth Opportunities in the Chinese Composites Market: 2012-2017."

Lucintel's research outlines how the rapid growth in China's economy has grown the demand for glass fiber. Demand of fiber-reinforced composites for 2012 is anticipated to be roughly 4,418 kilotons (9,737 million pounds) in China. Transportation, construction, aerospace, and defense are expected to drive strong growth during the forecast period of 2012–2017. Lucintel expects higher market fragmentation in the future because of further growth and diversification in the emerging Chinese economy. Future markets are anticipated to be highly competitive, and those companies that demonstrate the most innovative and comprehensive capabilities can thrive and gain market share.

As the study reveals the composites industry has demonstrated high short-term volatility, and geopolitical or geoeconomic instability can bring sudden changes to the marketplace. Over the long term, growth in the composite materials industry is sustainable with more than 5,000 composites applications worldwide. The industry has great future potential as increasing numbers of composite materials applications are being researched and developed.
