Abstracts

Bioactive peptides are a form of prepropeptides, which are synthesized in the cell and modified to active proteins. Bioactive Peptides act as signaling molecules in pathogenesis and physiological functions. They are inactive forms and released during food processing or gastrointestinal digestion. Bioactive peptides act as a regulatory compound like hormones after they liberated. The source of bioactive peptides is milk, plant, and meat. Bioactive peptides produced by enzyme proteolysis derived from microorganisms, hydrolysis by digestive enzymes and milk fermentation with proteolytic starter clusters. The most common of production bioactive peptides are enzymatic hydrolysis. Many bioactive active peptides produced using Pepsin or trypsin (produces calcium binding phosphopeptides and Angiotensin-converting enzyme inhibitory peptides). Apart from the natural way of bioactive peptides production, recombinant DNA techniques also used. Bioactive peptides also generated through non-starter and starter bacteria. The also play an important role in the regulation of digestive system and modulation of nutrient absorption. Upon administration, they affect major body systems like digestive, immune, cardiovascular, and nervous system.
