Abstracts

Commercial boilers are pressurized systems that burn combustible fuel or use electricity to heat water for heating buildings. Some types of boilers use hot water itself, while other types of boilers rely on water that has been converted to steam. Inside the boiler, the burner or electrical coil generates heat that is transferred to the water through the heat exchanger. Depending on the type of boiler, this process produces hot water or steam. Hot water or steam circulates through the pipes of the entire commercial facility. Water or steam enters the radiator or other components that dissipate heat, providing you with the heating you need for the comfort of your interior.
