High-density fiberboard is a kind of board made of wood fiber or other plant fiber as raw material, applied with urea-formaldehyde resin or other synthetic resin under heating and pressurizing conditions. High-Density Fiberboard (HDF), also known as hardboard, is an engineered fiberboard that is processed by compressing wood fibers extracted from chips and pulped wood waste under high pressures. It is suitable for non-load bearing interior applications in dry conditions. Consequently, it is extensively utilized across the construction and automotive industries for numerous applications. With the rapid development of the architectural decoration and furniture industry, the global demand for wood has increased sharply, and the gap in wood supply has become more and more prominent. The development of the wood-based panel industry is conducive to alleviating the contradiction between the country's timber supply and demand and is an important way to save timber resources.
